Conclusion

Finally, to start repairing your credit score, you must begin a chronological sequence of actions that will need credit reporting bureaus, creditors, debt collectors, and other entities with which you engage in financial transactions to guarantee that the information they collect, report, and/or sell about you is precise. You must also be mindful that per the FCRA the credit bureaus are not supposed to be reporting your items without valid proof that the items belong to you, which is your signature from the original contract you signed. Know this fact can largely reduce the time that your derogatory items will remain on your credit report.

You are likely aware of standard credit reports compiled about you that outline your financial history, but there are two types of credit reports that may be purchased about you. A standard credit report is a report that most lenders and creditors purchase. An investigative credit report may also be purchased, which contains more detailed information about your financial history and your behaviors. As if that were not enough, there are also other types of consumer reports that are used to profile your worthiness in other types of transactions that involve money. Insurance companies, employers, and other business entities purchase consumer reports about you that include information other than credit histories. They also purchase scores that are other than credit scores but relate to the particular area of interest. While these other consumer reports and scores may not directly affect your credit score, they may be used to damage your ability to engage in activities that you thought only your credit score would be used to qualify for.

While there are many factors involved in repairing your credit score, your commitment to repairing your score is important. You, not the credit reporting agencies, your creditors, nor the government is going to take responsibility to repair your credit score for you.

This book will give you all of the information that you'll need to begin repairing your credit score now.

Procrastination will not solve your credit issues. Don't wait. Start repairing and improving your credit now by going to www.credithealing.org.
